> The My girlfriend and I went there about a few weeks ago to go see some old friends who worked there, my grandmother passed away the week before so I needed some comfort. As I walked in the managers told me that they had too many reservations and couldn't take us and asked us to leave, when we tried telling the general manager (Jannette) we just wanted to see some friends her response was "Que pena" which translates to "too bad", it's was 8pm they close at 10pm and they continued taking guest after us. I'm only making this review because after I told my family members it upset them. Thank you for the hearts 🙏

> I've ordered Rreal Tacos twice now with my family. The first time, in person, we enjoyed the atmosphere and thought the food was delicious. However, later that night, both my husband and toddler became tremendously ill with food poisoning, which carried on for two days. Thinking that they may have been more sensitive to something they ate, I ordered a meal for myself more recently. Again, it was delicious in taste, but I then also got food poisoning just a few hours later and remained sick for hours. This has not happened with other places we've eaten in the area and doesn't happen at home, so this restaurant appears to be our common denominator. I'm disappointed that such a nice looking place with good tasting food has now left my family 2 for 2 on being left ill after a meal.

> I waited for more than 20 minutes for someone to come to my table, but no one ever attended me. The restaurant didn't seem that busy, yet no staff member acknowledged me or offered service. Very disappointing experience.

> The Middest of the Mid. The wall of tequila, decorated with a colorful orange backlight is enticing. The place is fairly new to Downtown Duluth and is much more lively than the clique-ish brewery that is "too cool for school" across the breezeway. BUT $30 for a taco, queso and one margarita seems a bit pricey for Duluth. The bartender/waiter was nice and said that they take "2 days to make the tortillas". Supposedly the most authentic around. The Pastor lacked any flavor and the tortilla was pretty tough to eat. "Queso with jalapeños" comes with several large jalapeños and not any mixed in. More jalapeños is an up-charge of $5. So didn't do that. The margarita tasted 'batched' and was watery. Very nice decor though.

> First. SERVERS DO NOT GET GRATUITY UNLESS ITS CASH. What a joke for a business practice. Regardless our server was great. Burrito steak was BLAND. The hot sauce on the table helped but come on. Got a mojito pitcher which was ok. The burrito bowl was a better option but it was still bland as well. Got shrimp in the bowl which was better than the steak. Got a few other options but doubly I will be back. Food prices were a bit high. Servers don't get CC tips. Food quality was avg at best. Too many other food options that have good flavors in the meal. For some reason this place reminds me of a chipotle.

> $17 just to park. I'm sure the food is fine, but they need to fix their parking situation.

> Rreal Tacos clearly has a great marketing strategy. The place looks nice, the service was good, and prices are somewhat reasonable, not the cheapest but not outrageous either. I also liked that they take walk ins and the ambiance feels fresh without the typical kitchen smell. That said, there were some downsides. The restaurant was very hot. They had multiple AC units running so they were clearly trying, but it still felt like summer inside even though it is only March. Food wise, it was average. We tried the Birria Ramen for the novelty. It was not bad, but definitely not something I would order again. There are better options for the price and flavor. The biggest disappointment was the carnitas tacos. They were extremely oily, not just tender but literally soaked in oil to the point you could barely taste the actual flavor. We even took them home to cook them again just to remove some of the excess oil. Service was good considering how busy the place was. The drinks were actually the highlight. The juices and cocktails were fresh, flavorful, and not overloaded with sugar. Overall it was an interesting experience, but I personally do not understand the hype. It feels more like a good spot for drinks than for food.

> If you value basic food quality and respect as a customer, avoid the Real Tacos on the BeltLine.I ordered a cheese birria quesadilla. The first one came out burnt and looked nothing like it normally does or like the photos they advertise. It looked rushed and careless. I sent it back.While waiting for the remake, I watched my server take the plate to the manager and another staff member. Instead of taking it seriously, they laughed when she told them I needed it remade because it was burnt. That alone told me everything about the level of professionalism and respect in that kitchen. Then the replacement came out…….. It was packed with 10 to 11 thick, solid chunks of straight white fat. Not small pieces. Large, rubbery, unchewable lumps that should have been trimmed and thrown away. It looked like scraps that never should have made it onto a plate. My stomach immediately turned. The person I was with was so disgusted by how it looked that they ran to the bathroom and threw up.I brought it to the manager and told him I was not paying. He did not ask what was wrong. He did not apologize. He did not try to fix it. He looked at the plate, nodded, and let me walk out. That reaction alone confirms he knew it was unacceptable.The restaurant may look nice and stay busy, but appearance clearly matters more than quality control or customer care. Serving food like that and laughing when a customer sends something back speaks for itself.

I normally love rreal tacos but the service at this one was so bad tonight. We got a to go order and the food was late which I understand happens but the hostess was so rude to us and did not check or look for our order even after it had been 30 minutes late. It was almost as if it was out of spite. Our order had been ready and sitting in the heater thing for a while and she just couldn’t be bothered to check. Terrible service. Disappointing!!
